Excerpt: .implicit logic defying articulate analysis.1 The contents of such knowledge share the common necessity of every kind of knowledge, of being subject to the test of wider experience. If it stands this test, it is as securely established as it can be. The knowledge which physical scientists possess of natural laws has this nature. As we have said already, the validity of knowledge does not depend ultimately upon the nature of the rational process, if normal, by which it is conditioned, but upon the trustworthiness of our cognitive faculties, a trustworthiness which we have to assume in practice; and it is confirmed by the harmony of what we are conscious of knowing with experience in general. There are only two legitimate ways of impugning the testimony of consciousness in this matter: (a) by showing that our minds have acted contrary to the observed laws of...
