Excerpt: . . . a loss for the other, Ill come to you, Supple, and be indebted to your friendship. Sir HARRY. Well said, George. ; SUPPLE. Hang him, his wit is like his money, all borrowed. GEORGE. Envy; by this light, mere envy. SUPPLE. You see he is not worth a repartee-- Draw on him at sight, and he has not wherewithal! to answer. GEORGE. No, not when you are the indorser. But come, this is trifling. My sister has brought you an unexpected visitor, Sir Harry. Dorinda, who is just returned from the country. She was once a flame of yours--But remember, keep to the newgame you have started. SUPPLE. Faith, George, you have reason to be jealous there; at least on your mistresss side. For if I understand the language of the heart, my cousin knows how to distinguish between her late lover and her intended....
